HIGH ADVENTURE

PRODUCTION DIARY

It was non-stop action for Michael J. Fox and the crew in the first weeks of filming on Back to the Future Part III!

From the beginning of September 1989, and for the next couple of weeks, the shooting schedule for Back to the Future Part III followed Marty's arrival in Hill Valley in 1885, making the most of the huge set on location in Sonora, California with its faithful replica of an Old West town.

ROUGH RIDE

Marty's introduction to Hill Valley wasn't exactly gentle, though. He's almost run over by a stagecoach, then, thanks to an encounter with Mad Dog Tannen and his gang, Marty is shot at, chased down, lassoed and dragged along the main street. Once again, Fox must have wondered what he'd signed up for.

For at least some shots, Fox was able to call on the services of his regular stunt double Charlie Croughwell, who had helped to make the earlier skateboard and hoverboard sequences look even more death-defying. In a replica of Fox's 'Atomic Cowboy' costume, the resemblance between the two performers was startling. But there was one sequence that didn't allow for a double – it involved Marty being strung up by Tannen outside the portico of the courthouse.

HANGING TOUGH

For the first attempt at the scene, Fox stood on a raised platform and leaned forward so that the rope appeared to be pulled down by his weight. Director Robert Zemeckis didn't think this looked entirely convincing and Fox agreed. "Bob asked me if I could make the swinging action more natural," said Fox "and I said, not unless my feet are dangling."

Bravely, he volunteered to do the stunt in a harness, holding the rope at his neck and flailing his legs. Stunt coordinator Walter Scott helped Fox back into a rig like the one he had worn for the hoverboard sequences in the previous film. Fox said, "I remember saying to Bob 'Now you're going to see some real acting, watch this!'"

Fox later recalled that he passed out on the end of the rope and was brought down immediately by Scott. "Bob thought I was doing a really god job, and I was unconscious on the end of the rope." In the story, of course, Marty is rescued by the arrival of Doc Bown, who has fitted his rifle with a specially-made telescopic sight. "This can shoot the fleas off a dog's back at 500 yards, Tannen," Doc shouts, "and it's pointed straight at your head!" As an example of Doc's sharpshooting, he shoots through the rope holding Marty up.

SPARRING PARTNERS

The scene was the first time that Christopher Lloyd (Doc) and Thomas Wilson (Tannen) had exchanged dialogue, and screenwriter/co-creator Bob Gale was delighted to see two comic talents playing off each other. "A good actor makes other actors better," Gale remarked, "and we had two great actors."

Doc certainly makes an impression in his long duster coat and wide-brimmed hat. "Doc is the romantic lead in Part III,' Gale continued, "so we wanted him to look the part. Actors love doing Westerns because they always look good in those clothes. Bob Zemeckis loved the long coats in Once Upon A Time in the West and The Long Riders, so that was on our mind when we devised a costume for Chris." ■

SEAMUS MCFLY

A FAMILY RESEMBLANCE

In Hill Valley 1885, Marty McFly meets his great-great grandfather!

Time goes in circles – or so it would seem. When Marty McFly travels back to 1885 to rescue Doc Brown, he finds himself at the homestead of a certain Seamus McFly. Seamus is Marty's great-great grandfather, but the two, apart from Seamus's red hair and wispy moustache, are so alike that they could be twins.

Seamus and his lovely wife Maggie have travelled from their homeland in Ireland and recently settled in Hill Valley, living and working in a farmhouse outside of town, together with new baby William, born in April 1885. Seamus proudly introduces "the first McFly to be born in America" and the baby immediately takes to Marty. The gentle and hardworking McFlys are much liked by the townspeople of Hill Valley, with the notable exception of local outlaw Buford 'Mad Dog' Tannen – although, to be fair, he doesn't like anyone very much.

Seamus proves to be a brave ally for Marty during his crazy adventures, but the Irishman never gets to know the whole truth about his future great-great-grandson, and only ever knows the familiar-looking stranger by the name of 'Clint Eastwood'! ■

QUICK FACTS!

FAMILY LINES

- Seamus McFly was, of course, played by Michael J. Fox. The shots of Seamus and Marty interacting were created with the motion control rig that was used for similar effects in Part II.
- The role of Seamus was originally conceived for Crispin Glover, as George McFly had a reduced role in the second film. Glover declined to appear in the sequels, so Fox was the obvious alternative, with Lea Thompson as Maggie.
- Fox created laughter on set when, during the scene where Seamus brings home two rabbits for supper, he appeared not with the expected prop rabbits, but instead with a huge stuffed Roger Rabbit toy!
